Comments	The problem is well researched based on desk research and interviews. However, this is not transferred to the problem statement. The statement should be short and nail the problem. It should not detail the scenario or rephrase the broad challenge statement made available. For a problem statement, you need to analyze your research insights and then you must ask yourselves what are the real pain point(s) behind this problem? And you need to take into account the ski enthusiasts perspectives. What are their pain points that the German Ski Association in its position could offer a solution for? The problem statement should focus on the target audience and present the real problem (= the pain point(s)). Furthermore, a problem statement should not include the solution or indications of it.

Comments	The empathy maps misses the pains and gains which leads to the identification of opportunities. The ideation is briefly documented. It seems you referred to an "ideas image" that is not present. If this is so, please updated and let Audrey Stolze know, so she reviews the current 6 points for ideation. What about the sponsors of the ski federation's events. How can they benefit from your app? Does the app track the users on the slopes so you can find your group of friends? Can you create a group? Can you create/propose pop-meetings like meeting for lunch at specific restaurant on the slope? Can you create fun competitions among the users (e.g. collect points on a kind of fun race?!) Can you find users per skill level? Can people point out on their profile if they are willing to help /teach others to ski and what they want to get for it? (Novice skiers might find paid courses and private classes inflexible and expensive and

	maybe would be motivated to pay informally or exchange for a paid lunch, for someone with more experience to give them some tips...)
